Talking About Chiari

Talking about Chiari, especially when you’ve been recently diagnosed, can be difficult. It is an emotional, often overwhelming time, and sometimes it can seem like no one really understands what is going on. Although it is difficult, here are some tips for talking about Chiari.

1. Realize That Every Person’s Experience Is Unique
   Some people will be very empathetic, some will not. However, it is impossible for someone else to really understand at a deep level what you are going through. Everyone has unique dreams; everyone experiences symptoms differently. Don’t expect too much from people.

2. Accept That People Don’t Always Know What To Say
   Research has shown that the majority of people do not know how to respond when discussing a serious illness with someone. This leads to many people, even close friends and family, saying inappropriate things. This does not necessarily mean they are not sympathetic and caring, it may just mean they don’t know what to say or how to handle their own emotions.

3. Let The Person You Are Talking To Take The Lead
   One way to discuss the topic with someone who knows nothing about it is to start at a high-level and then let them take the lead in determining how much they want to know. For example, start with, “Chiari is a neurological condition affecting the brain and the top of the spine” For some people this will be enough. Others may want to know how it affected you and how it is treated. Again, let the other person take the lead by asking questions, don’t launch into a 20 minute monologue.

4. Keep Your Emotions Out Of It!
   Even though you are talking about an illness which may have devastated your life, the reality is that people don’t respond well to negativity. When talking about Chiari, it’s best to try to keep emotion out of it, the message will get through better.

5. Use Plain English When Describing Chiari
   Avoid medical jargon and don’t fall into the doctor trap. The person you are talking to will more than likely be hearing about Chiari for the first time. They are already baffled by the word “Chiari”, adding in words that have become everyday for you, like foramen magnum, syringomyelia or posterior fossa, may overwhelm them enough to end the conversation.

6. Practice Makes Perfect!
   Just like anything, you can get better - and more comfortable - talking about Chiari over time. Develop your own style and stick with what works.
